Peasants did not act as the political police had hoped when they hoarded grain in the 1924 scissors crisis and again during the 1927 war scare, or when they failed to elect politically reliable poor peasants to rural soviets. Political police reports blamed the kulaks, and this shift justified the brutal collectivization of agriculture.

Abstract. That the Soviets turned to the political police in an effort to surveil and administer rural Russia is in no way surprising given the long experience in Russia of attempting to use the police to peer into society.Obtaining information about what was actually occurring beyond the limits of the capitals had, for centuries, bedeviled Russian rulers.
